Intergenerational solidarity from the perspective of relationships between adult children and their ageing parents

Justification of the RATP

An important article focusing on an important social issue in the context of social work - cited abroad and in indexed databases.

OCA16.1 - Annotation of the output in English

This survey article describes variability of human relations between generations of relatives, their support exchange and options and limits of informal care for the elderly in Slovakia and in the world. Informal caregiving relationship is perceived as one of forms of solutions for a longterm care for older persons. In this contribution, we also deal with an educational side to intergenerational relationships as a starting line for educators of helping workers. Intergenerational relationships can only be realized in mutual interaction, thanks to which ensures the transmission of social values, attitudes, customs, knowledge and skills. Intergenerational relations and their perspective in Slovakia will depend on certain historical experiences, economic and material conditions of families and, last but not least, on the personal preferences of specific actors. This, however, what is in the hands of the educators of the so-called helping workers is the promotion and strengthening of intergenerational learning as one of the pillars of the so-called "knowledge society".

OCA18.1 - Characteristics of the output's impact on socio-economic practice

The contribution presents a theoretical approach to the socio-political aspect of family intergenerational relationships, which are one of the forms of long-term care for the elderly and/or the sick. Both the cared for and the caregivers are part of the social security system. It is also important in educational terms in the training of helping workers. The article highlights the importance of the relationship between adult children and their ageing parents, making a number of practical and policy implications. In terms of social impacts, these include strengthening family relationships and reducing social isolation of seniors, and promoting community programmes focused on intergenerational relationships. Economic impacts can be formulated in terms of the need to balance family care and economic sustainability. At the same time, the article can motivate the creation of services that reduce the burden on families. It proposes social service reform and flexibility for working carers as an impetus for policy and practice. At the same time, it supports social workers in resolving conflicts within families and in promoting intergenerational relationships.

OCA19.1 - Characteristics of the output and related activities' impact on the educational process

Students will learn about the parallels of intergenerational relationships in the past and present, the importance of the family in caring for a senior member, and the educational dimension of intergenerational relationships not only in the education of social workers. The article promotes the integration of theory, research and practice at all levels of education. In undergraduate education, it is about a basic understanding of intergenerational relationships and solidarity, and the article can also be used to practice practical skills in fostering family bonds and conflict resolution. In the Master's degree, students should be able to analyse the socio-economic impacts of elderly care in more depth through working with the article and to observe or understand the development of intervention designs in social services and community programmes. As part of their doctoral studies, they should be able to elaborate or analyse research(s) focused on policy and systemic solutions to promote intergenerational solidarity. At the same time, the article could contribute to the ability of doctoral students to develop innovative strategies for social work education and practice.

Justification of the RATP

A groundbreaking monograph in the field of social work with the elderly, which is in demand, cited and used in the book market today.

OCA16.2 - Annotation of the output in English

The monograph provides a theoretical overview of the basic characteristics of the aging process and the specifics associated with this developmental stage of life. It highlights not only the biological aspects of old age, but especially its social determinants, such as autonomy, loneliness of the elderly and intergenerational relationships. It specifies the phenomenon of the quality of life of the elderly and the need to accentuate it when working with them, and offers a number of specific themes arising from the practical performance of social work with the elderly. It draws attention to the importance of adaptation to old age as well as adaptation to staying in social services. It highlights the application and use of several supportive therapies in the life of the elderly. Information from social gerontology is also useful for other helping professionals who work with seniors.

OCA18.2 - Characteristics of the output's impact on socio-economic practice

A publication focusing on social work with older people has important implications for socio-economic practice, particularly in the context of the increasing need for quality care for older citizens. In the monograph, the author identifies the key challenges faced by the elderly, enabling a better understanding of their needs and the development of more effective and sustainable social service policies.

The impact on economic practice lies in promoting the efficient use of public and private resources in the provision of care for the elderly. This output can lead to cost optimisation in social and health services, while developing new job opportunities in the gerontology and social work sector. It also influences policy decisions on employment and pensions, which can have a long-term economic impact.

In social practice, the output contributes to creating better conditions for integrating older people into society and promoting their active participation. The publication offers practical tools and approaches that can be applied to improve the quality of life of the elderly, while strengthening ethical and professional standards in the field of social work. In this way, it has a direct impact on improving the quality of care and well-being of older people in the wider social context.

The impact of this publication is therefore twofold: not only does it contribute to the theoretical development of the field of social work, but it also has a concrete and practical impact on policy making, public services and on improving economic efficiency in the field of care for the elderly.

OCA19.2 - Characteristics of the output and related activities' impact on the educational process

Impact of the monograph on the educational process in the field of social work - at the bachelor's level of study it provides basic theoretical knowledge about ageing, demographic and social aspects. Students gain practical tools and recommendations for working with seniors, including case studies useful for internships. In the master's degree, the monograph deepens professional knowledge of the political, legal and institutional aspects of elder care. It also offers tools for assessing the needs of seniors and application approaches to support them. In doctoral studies, the monograph can serve as a research basis for the development of innovative methods of social work with the elderly and also emphasizes the ethical, legislative and international dimensions of care. The overall contribution of the monograph to the educational process is that it integrates theory and practice, thus preparing students at all levels to address the challenges of an ageing population and to support the quality of life of older people.

Justification of the RATP

It is a significant chapter in a groundbreaking publication (in which M. Hrozenská has a 50% share - he has written 2 chapters and co-authored one) used in the Czech-Slovak space across all universities educating (not only) social and health-social workers. It is still used, quoted and demanded on the book market by authorities in the field of social sciences.

OCA16.3 - Annotation of the output in English

The chapter Seniors by Martina Hrozenska in the monograph Social Care for Seniors provides a comprehensive view of the position of seniors in society from the perspective of social work. The author analyzes key challenges related to population aging, such as social isolation, limited access to services, and the need for an individualized approach to care. The chapter emphasizes the importance of social workers in supporting active aging, enhancing seniors' participation in social life, and creating inclusive social assistance strategies. Special attention is given to multidisciplinary collaboration, ethical considerations, and the development of innovative approaches to ensure a dignified and high-quality life for seniors in the context of a changing socio-economic reality.

OCA18.3 - Characteristics of the output's impact on socio-economic practice

The chapters in the monograph offer an important insight into the issue of population ageing and its implications for society. It focuses on the needs of the elderly in the context of social care and their place in the socio-economic system. The (key) impacts of the chapter on socio-economic practice can be seen along the following lines: a) Promoting the integration of the elderly into society, as the chapter emphasises the need to involve the elderly in social life, thereby contributing to reducing their social isolation. b) Improving the quality of social services, because it provides expert recommendations for making services for the elderly, including health care and social assistance, more efficient. This has a positive impact on economic aspects, as quality care can reduce the costs of health interventions. c) Economic potential of seniors, as it highlights that seniors are not only beneficiaries of support but also active contributors to the economy (e.g. by being consumers or by transferring experience). This has implications for market strategies targeting this age group. d) Pressure for policy reforms, where the chapter points to the need for systemic changes, such as reform of the pension system or the financing of care for the elderly, to ensure their long-term economic and social sustainability. And last but not least, after e) Emphasizing the individuality of seniors, when the perspective of seniors is presented as diverse and complex, leading to greater sensitivity in socio-economic strategies to reflect the different needs of this population.

OCA19.3 - Characteristics of the output and related activities' impact on the educational process

The chapter "Seniors" from the monograph "Social Care for the Elderly" by Dvořáčková Dagmara and Hrozenská Martina provides a comprehensive view of the issue of care for the elderly, emphasizing the role of social work in this area. The content of the chapter has a significant potential to contribute to the formation of the educational process of future social workers at all three levels of higher education (bachelor, master and doctoral studies). The chapter can be used in bachelor's studies, it can serve as a basis for introductory courses focused on social care and aimed at understanding the specific needs of the elderly, as well as demographic trends and the challenges posed by an ageing population. Through the chapter, students can learn the basic principles of working with seniors, including building empathy, work ethics, and promoting the dignity of seniors. Practical activities: preparation for working in residential facilities, simulating situations with clients, and solving model cases.

At the master's level, the chapter offers a deeper insight into complex issues facing seniors, such as the prevention of social exclusion, the promotion of intergenerational solidarity, and a multidisciplinary approach to care. The content of the chapter can be used to prepare students to manage social projects and teams, including the application of innovative care strategies for the elderly. Practical activities: designing projects for seniors, case studies on the implementation of social policies in practice.

In the doctoral programme, the chapter offers a space for scientific investigation and critical analysis of social care for the elderly, which is crucial for the development of new theories and methods in social work. Doctoral students can use the chapter to explore the effectiveness of social programs, the impact of aging on society, and the development of policies for the elderly. Practical activities: conducting research projects, publishing studies and collaborating with professional institutions.

Related activities in education can be considered and implemented as (a) organisation of workshops and lectures with practitioners; (b) simulation of case studies/case studies aimed at dealing with specific situations of the elderly; (c) involvement of students in volunteer activities in social service facilities for the elderly; (d) support for the production of theses and dissertations on elderly care issues.

Women (not only) in politics a hundred years ago and today

Suggested output quality level

Justification of the RATP

A significant article for the field of social work because of its innovative and modern scholarly perspective and in the context of social work.

OCA16.4 - Annotation of the output in English

The aim of the paper is a historical analysis of the status of women in the Austro-Hungarian Empire and later in Czechoslovakia. It focuses on women's struggle for the right to vote and gender equality in several areas of social life from the past to the present. The paper also provides an enumeration of women politicians 1. Czechoslovak Republic. The paper is theoretical in nature. It has been compiled through the analysis of historical documents dating mainly from the second half of the 19th century to the present day. The analysed documents and articles concern the position of women in society over the years and their participation in legislative and executive power. The first political discussions on women's suffrage in the present-day Slovakia are recorded at the beginning of the 20th century. Women won the right to vote through associations and magazines, when they tried to influence their male colleagues and draw them into the issue. After the recognition of the right to vote for all citizens, regardless of gender and social status, the controversy over emancipation ended and the "struggle" focused nationally on the issues of eight-hour working hours, childcare and women's night work. The theoretical anchoring of the topic lies in the perception of a feminist approach in social work as one of its roots. We see a direct link with social work in political action, as both are aimed at helping the person as such and thus society. Both are also oriented towards defending and promoting justice for all.

OCA18.4 - Characteristics of the output's impact on socio-economic practice

The article has a broad potential to influence the social and economic spheres by promoting education, more inclusive policies and innovative initiatives to promote women's equality in different areas of social life. 1. Raising awareness of the historical development of the status of women - the article analyses the position of women in politics in the past and present, thereby highlighting the challenges associated with achieving gender equality. This awareness is essential for shaping social discourse and changing stereotypical attitudes.

2. Promoting Gender Equality in Political and Public Institutions - The article provides empirical data and historical contexts that can be used to design policies that promote equal opportunities for women and men in political and decision-making processes.

3. Impact on education and outreach - the article can serve as a resource for educational programs and outreach campaigns aimed at encouraging women to participate in public and political life, thereby contributing to long-term increases in women's representation in these areas.

4. Inspiration for the development of initiatives to support women - the analysis in the article motivates the development of projects and initiatives to support women's career development, whether in politics, business or science. Its insights are applicable to organisations working to reduce gender inequalities.

5. Economic benefits of greater inclusiveness - Gender equality and greater participation of women in politics and public life can contribute to better decision-making and a greater diversity of solutions to economic and social problems, which has a positive impact on the overall development of society.

OCA19.4 - Characteristics of the output and related activities' impact on the educational process

The article contributes significantly to the educational process by providing both historical and current perspectives on the status of women in politics. Its content fosters analytical, debating and practical skills in students at all levels of study, while motivating them to take an interest in issues of gender equality and active citizenship. The bachelor's degree: 1) Introduction to Gender Issues - The article can be used as supplementary study material in subjects such as sociology, political science or social work. 2) Promoting discussion - Through analysis of historical facts and comparison with today, students can develop critical thinking skills and lead discussions on the topic of gender equality.

For the Master's degree, it will be about deepening the knowledge of gender equality - The article can be included in seminars and lectures so that students can analyse the impact of gender inequalities on political and social processes. Further, it can be applied to practical solutions - Students can use the article to design programmes to support women in politics, which helps to link theory to practice.

In the context of PhD studies, the article can be an inspiration for research - PhD students can use the article as a theoretical basis for their own research on gender equality in politics or in the broader context of social change. At the same time, the development of pedagogical activities can be achieved - in fact, PhD students can include the article in their lectures or seminars for teaching in the context of the provision of courses in the bachelor's degree. studies, thus developing didactic skills and contributing to the dissemination of knowledge.

Perception of agents assisting women experiencing violence in couple relations

Suggested output quality level

Justification of the RATP

The article is indexed in WoS and is a breakthrough article in the field of systematic solutions to help victims of violence (women) in society, based on unique research conducted.

OCA16.5 - Annotation of the output in English

OBJECTIVES: To provide the perspective on perception of women's NGOs, advocacy and health professionals as formal actors assisting women experiencing violence. METHODS: Data were collected through a questionnaire and semi structured interview and processed using the method of qualitative thematic analysis based on a phenomenological approach. RESULTS: They point to women's experiences with aid actors located in the so-called formal environment and to a fundamental need in educational practice on this topic. IMPLICATIONS FOR PRACTICE: The approach of the Police, the Courts and also the Office of Labour, Social Affairs and Family appears to be insufficiently supportive and helpful. Women's experiences with helping organizations that provide specialized assistance to women are positive.

OCA17.5 - List of maximum 5 most significant citations corresponding to the output

So far no responses - the article was published only a few months ago.

OCA18.5 - Characteristics of the output's impact on socio-economic practice

The article has a significant socio-economic impact as it highlights the need for a sensitive and professionally informed approach to women experiencing violence. It provides valuable insights for improving social work practice, supporting survivors and developing effective policies. The characteristics of the impacts on socio-economic practice can be identified and formulated into several areas:

1. Increased awareness of domestic violence - the article highlights the importance of correct perception and support from agents working with women experiencing violence, thus contributing to raising social awareness of this serious problem.
2. Improving services for victims of violence - identifying key factors in the approach of agents (social workers, therapists, legal representatives) allows to improve the services provided and to ensure more effective assistance to victims.
3. Promoting multidisciplinary cooperation - the article underlines the importance of coordination between different professions and institutions, thus contributing to building a comprehensive system of assistance to women that is able to respond to their individual needs.
4. Contribution to public policy-making - the results of the article can serve as a basis for the design of measures aimed at preventing violence and supporting victims, which can positively influence legislation and policy in the field of social protection and gender equality.
5. Economic impact - a reduction in the incidence of domestic violence and more effective assistance to victims can reduce the costs associated with health care, social assistance or the legal treatment of cases of violence in the long term, thus improving the overall economic efficiency of the system.

OCA19.5 - Characteristics of the output and related activities' impact on the educational process

The article has a significant impact on the education of future social workers because it provides practice-oriented knowledge about working with victims of violence in couple relationships. It also promotes the development of students' analytical and critical thinking skills, their readiness for practice and their ability to implement a multidisciplinary approach. Regarding the impact on the educational process in the training of future social workers, the article can be viewed from 2 levels for undergraduate studies: 1) through an introduction to the issue of domestic violence - the article can be used as a basic study material for courses related to social work, family therapy or crisis intervention, so that students understand the dynamics of violence in couple relationships. 2) Practical orientation - the article provides case studies and examples from practice that allow students to become familiar with the roles and challenges of social workers when working with victims of violence. Specialist skills may be developed within the Masters level of study as the article can be incorporated into discussions and seminars on advanced methods of social intervention, encouraging the development of specialist skills in victim support. At the same time, an article within this degree can help to identify and develop models of help - students can use the article to design and evaluate models of help and collaboration between social workers and other professions (e.g. psychologists, lawyers). Doctoral studies create scope for using the article for: a) research in the field of domestic violence, where doctoral students can use the article as a resource to deepen the theoretical framework and inspire their own research on couple violence and the effectiveness of victim support; and 2) in the framework of innovation of educational programmes - based on the article, doctoral students can design new approaches in the education of social workers in order to better reflect current challenges in the field of crisis intervention and victim protection.
